What You Should Know About the West Nile Virus

West Nile virus is commonly found in Africa, the Middle East and West Asia and was first detected in the United States in 1999. The virus is spread by the bite of an infected mosquito. It infects people, birds, horses, cats, dogs, and some other animals such as chipmunks, bats, skunks, squirrels and domestic rabbits.

Preventive measures include using a mosquito repellent that provides protection while you are outdoors. Mosquitoes can bite through thin clothing, so you also may want to spray your clothing with a repellent. It's also a good precaution to place mosquito netting over infant carriers. You can reduce the numbers of mosquitoes in areas where you work or recreate by periodically draining sources of standing water such as flower pots, birdbaths, swimming pool covers, livestock and pet water dishes and bins, and miscellaneous buckets and barrels. Contact your veterinarian for information on infection control precautions when caring for a sick animal.

Current estimates indicate that only about 20 percent of people who become infected will develop any type of illness. Mild symptoms can include fever, headache and body aches, swollen lymph glands, and a skin rash. Severe symptoms can include high fever, headache and neck stiffness, disorientation, coma, tremors, convulsions, muscle weakness, and paralysis. The symptoms may occur within 3-14 days of mosquito bites.

Reporting dead birds to your local Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife (ODFW) office immediately can help prevent the spread of this virus. The Roseburg's ODFW office number is (541) 440-3353.

Currently in Oregon only avian, animal and/or mosquito infections have been present. Crows, jays, magpies and ravens are being tested. More information is available from the Centers for Disease Control Web site, including information on West Nile and horses, at <http://www.cdc.gov/ncidod/dvbid/westnile/> and the National Wildlife Health Center Web site at <http://www.nwhc.usgs.gov>.
